The British Safety Principle of Life Insurance Improved and implied in America by-

N BRITAIN, life insurance is from two to three times older than it is in America. It is recognized as a distinct science. While the British System is good, has stood the test of nearly three centuries, the saftety feature adopted by the FIDELITY, known as the "FOUSE SYSTEM," is superior. It assumes

FIRST: That values of real estate, railroad securities, government and corporate securities of all kinds, cannot be fixed or guaranteed by law, and that, therefore, it is unscientific, improper, and in many cases fatal, to fix a reserve by law as a test of solvency, represented by securities the value of which fluctuates, is uncertain, not fixed, or guaranteed by law.

SECOND: That the rate of interest varies in proportion to the fluctuation in the values of securities, and it is, therefore, wrong in principal and absurd in practice to fix by law the value of policies, based on a certain rate of interest, with penalty attached, that if the reserve, through depreciation of securities, or decline in rate of interest, become impaired, the company must stop business, and go into the hands of a receiver.

THIRD: That the past insurance experience furnishes the best possible basis of determining the future cost, and that life insurance companies should collect no more money in advance from policy-holders than past insurance experience shows to be necessary to enable them to discharge their obligations.

FOURTH: That there can be no absolute security afforded under a policy contract if both the premium and amount payable thereunder are fixed and predeterminated without any provision to meet variable conditions. Hence, THE FIDELITY MUTUAL LIFE ASSOCIATION writes a policy for a definite sum, collects in advance a gremium based on past insurance experience, and reserves the right through its "safety clause" to call upon members to make good any impairment of its mortuary fund. This in addition to affording a large saving in premiums payable in advance, guarantees or insures the insurance, renders the security absolute.

THE FIDELITY MUTUAL LIFE ASSOCIATION is not an old line company nor an assessment company in the usual sense of the term. It embraces the strong points of both, whilst eliminating their weaknesses. Its system is a protest against the old as well as a refutation of haphazard rates. ratio of assets to liability showing a surplus strength greater than that of any other company, with one of the greatest actuaries in America at its head. Issues overy desirable form of policy; incontestible, non-forfeitable, accurate and equitable surrender privileges. For definite statement of cost and advantages send address and age to W. A.
