

for the trial to commence Reynolds was seen to board a car going to Superior. Officer John Roberg called the station from Fifth avenue west and Superior street and the police auto was hurried after the car to overtake it before it crossed the interstate bridge.

When Reynolds saw he was being pursued he left the car and was chased by Capt. Fiskett and Detective Irvine. Reynolds explained his action by saying he was going to Superior for a witness to testify in his favor and that he ran because he knew if the officers got him they would not allow him to cross the bay. He was charged specifically with passing I. S. Guinn, a clothing dealer, a check on the City National bank when he had no funds in the institution.

The defense made was that Reynolds had dated the check ahead and requested Mr. Guinn to hold it for a stated time before putting it through the bank. The evidence showed that Reynolds had kept asking Guinn to delay cashing the check, alleging that he had not yet added to his balance in the bank. The check was for $5.
