Max Zalk, Hyman Y. Joseph and Louis Zalk are the first to comply with the law passed at the recent session of the legislature regarding the filing of certificates by parties conducting a co-partnership. They filed with the clerk of the district court yesterday certificates that they were doing business under the name of the Duluth Machinery company and the Duluth Iron & Metal company.

The law which called for this filing of certificates is House File No. 365, which says that no person or persons may conduct a commercial business under any designation, name or style which does not set forth the full individual name of one of the persons interested in the business, unless there is filed with the clerk of the district court a certificate setting forth the name under which the business is to be transacted and the names of the persons conducting the business with their postoffice addresses. To new concerns this must be done before business can be started. Those who have been in business must comply with the law within 90 days after its passage. The bill was approved on April 19. In every change of ownership of the business there must be filed a new certificate, the law says. Until this is done those named in the certificates previously filed are liable for certain credits. The law states that this bill does not apply to corporations, domestic or foreign, nor to co-partnerships in which one of the individual names of all members appear in the co-partnership's designation.

The men who filed yesterday have been in business five years. All have until July 19 in which to file their certificates and it is expected that there will be many visiting the district clerk's office in the next few weeks.
