

Caught On the Run

Sig Levy, the well-known deputy sheriff, is not in religious standing with his wife. The strained condition in their relations was brought about through Mr. Levy's attempt to fool his children while reading to them from the Bible.

The Jewish people last week were celebrating the feast of the Passover and one day Mrs. Levy admonished her husband that he should read certain passages from Holy Writ which deal with this particular season. Mr. Levy did not take kindly to the task. However, he did as his wife bade. After he read a few pages he skipped about 12 and the children began to snicker. They were promptly upbraided by their mother. A little further on the father skipped about 10 pages more and this brought an uproar from the children, who are familiar with the book.

When the children were threatened with physical chastisement for their unholy merriment Mr. Levy was forced to explain, and a special lecture for his particular benefit immediately followed.

Three young men about town who have no special vocations in life, but who can sing a little, organized a vocal trio which they called "The Big City Trio." After they had had several rehearsals in the rear of a downtown office building they went forth seeking whom they might devour. They were fortunate in securing employment at one of the picture shows, where they were advertised to appear each afternoon and evening for a limited period.

At this particular picture show an illustrated singer has been entertaining the multitudes for some time and when the "The Big City Trio" cut into the program he believed that he was about to be dismissed from service. Not caring to lose his job, he began framing against the trio.

He employed three boys, with lusty voices, gave them 10 cents each for their services, and posting them in the front row of seats had them yell "rotten" after every one of the trio selections. The owner of the theater did not care to have an act that was "rotten" so he promptly canceled the engagement of the trio.

The three young men are now looking for the illustrated singer.
