Tansportation Problem.

Present tendencies of designing central stations for supplying power to large districts and of concentrating their output in a few mammoth generating units have given rise to transport problems not always sufficiently appreciated, says Power. In Argentinian Corderillas, the cost of transport rose to enormous figures. Even the masonry walls entailed ten times the usual price. In such cases the bricks have frequently to be conveyed great distances by mules or by camels, as in Egypt.

The absence of cranes, winches, trucks of sufficient capacity, etc., may compel the engineer to invent new methods. As an example, large boilers, and even gas tanks, have, like ship hulls, been floated by their own buoyancy on rivers, or at the seacoast from one place to the other. This course must be adopted in the absence of transport vehicles of sufficient size, or when they cannot come close to the or when they cannot come close to the unloading station. Such remarkable sea trips have been made by some Sulzer fire tube boilers installed at the lead and silver mines of Almagrera, Spain, near the Mediterranean coast. Since the boilers, on account of their mechanical strength, could pass the breakers without any danger they breakers without any danger, they were readily hauled to the coast from the transatlantic steamer anchored at he roadstead. FIR NOW COUNTED AS A PULP WOOD,

The balsam fir, a tree which a few years ago was considered of little value, is now in demand for pulp wood, is the statement made by the United States department of agriculture in a bulletin issued on the subject.

This demand has been brought about, says the department, by the enormous expansion of the pulp industry during the last two decades, with its present consumption of three and a quarter millon cords of coniferous wood and the consequent rise in the price of million cords of coniferous wood and the consequent rise in the price of spruce, the wood most in demand for paper making. In addition, the department goes on to say, balsam has begun to take the place of spruce for rough lumber, laths and the like, as the price of the latter wood has risen.

The chief objection to the use of large amounts of balsam fir in the ground pulp process of paper making is said to be due to the so-called pitch in the wood, which injures the felts and cylinder faces upon which the pulp is rolled out. Balsam fir does not have a resinous wood, and the material which gums up the cylinder probably comes from grinding balsam under conditions adapted to spruce wood. Yet from 10 to 25 per cent and possibly more of balsam can be used in ground pulp without lowering the grade of pulp without lowering the grade of the paper produced. It is known that with balsam logs left lying in water, over a season this drawback practically some assert that too much balsam in the pulp gives a paper that lacks strength, snap and character.

At the present time balsam fir furnishes about 6 or 7 per cent of the domestic coniferous wood used by the country's pulp industry. The tree itself constitutes, numerically, about 20 per cent of the coniferous forest of Northern New York and Maine, and is abundant in many parts of New Hampshire, Vermont and in the swamps of northern Michigan, northern Wisconsin and Minnesota. It readily reforests cut over areas and attains a size suitable some assert that too much balsant in
