AT THE LYCEUM

The cavalry soldiers, who are appearing in "Arizona" this week at the Lyceum, almost appeared before their Duluth admirers in civilian dress for the week's engagement.

It was like this. The order for uniforms was sent to the Minneapolis customers, the nearest at hand, who misunderstood the order and sent a lot of uniforms appropriate for veterans of the Civil war. These in particular had a lot of local color, so much in fact that they might well have been accused of participating in the late unpleasantness. They would not do at all and were sent back.

The soldiers of the play still remained uniformless and the first performance of "Arizona" was approaching.

And then Jacob Wilk, manager of the Forbes Stock company, consulted the marine recruiting office who referred him to a man who referred him to another who said that if Mr. Wilk would come to the armory Sunday morning maybe he could help him out. The latter and the stage manager, Joseph Belmont, were on time and the armory was locked. However, they did a circus stunt of standing on each other's shoulders and prying open a window at the risk of being haled into police court. They found a trunk and took their choice of suits. An obliging grocery boy hustled them to the Lyceum and yellow stripes were sewed where white ones were before and passable cavalry uniforms were provided. It is these uniforms that Mr. Brandt, Mr. Saunders, Robert LeSueur and Mr. Forbes are wearing all of this week as servants of Uncle Samuel.

"Arizona" will be repeated tonight, tomorrow and Sunday nights and there will be Saturday and Sunday matinees.
