

Orthodox Jews End Observance of New Years

Orthodox Jews at sundown yesterday completed the observance of Rosh Hashonah, the Jewish New Year which began at sundown Friday. Reformed Jews observed Saturday only.

Blowing of the "shofar," or ram's horn trumpet formed an important part of yesterday's services in Duluth synagogues. Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement; the most solemn holiday of the Jewish calendar, will be observed Oct. 2.

The observance of Rosh Hashonah is not like the secular New Year but rather consists of a solemn review of the deeds of the year and a judging of one's self. It is considered a day of judgment and the tradition is that on Rosh Hashonah angels write in the book of judgment the good and bad deeds of each man's year.

The annual Yom Kippur ball will be given Oct. 2, at the Odd Fellows' temple, Lake avenue and First street, according to announcement made by Nathan Kremen, president of the Northern Lights, under whose auspices the dance is given. This is the opening dance of the Jewish New Year.
