HEATING STREET CARS

There is nothing so hard to heat as a street car. This is particularly true when low temperature is accompanied by a high wind. Thus far no means have been invented for keeping the air just inside the constantly opening door, or close to the walls, which are practically all glass, from 60 to 90 degrees warmer than the air immediately outside, as sometimes seems to be expected. Rapid circulation of hot water is handicapped as the radiating surfaces must be placed below the level of the heater in a street car.

We instruct our employes to keep the temperature in the cars as near 60 degrees as possible. A higher temperature would not be comfortable, as passengers wear outdoor winter clothing.

While our heaters are the best obtainable, they occasionally get out of order. The causes of trouble are sometimes unavoidable, but often due to an attempt to force the circulation too rapidly by the "motorman" in response to requests of passengers to "fire up." This usually blows all the water out through the safety valve and a cold car with a hot fire in the heater is the result. It is then necessary to run the car to the carhouse and rebuild the fire, but before it can complete its trip many passengers are likely to ride upon it and suffer more or less with the cold. We are using every effort to make such cases as rare as possible.
